To be able to load these DLLs into the application, I have to know where they are installed on the development machine at build time. I've specified the path in my project properties but I need to be able to change this at runtime. One way I know of to find out where the DLLs are installed is to use the System.Reflection.Assembly.LoadFrom method, like so: Assembly assembly = Assembly.LoadFrom("path to dll"); I need to do this process on the fly, however, and not knowing the current location of the DLLs at runtime is making this difficult. Is there a way to find out the current path where the DLLs are installed at runtime? A: You can try to get the path from the directory where your dll is installed. This path may change with your installation method. System.IO.Path.GetDirectoryName(System.Reflection.Assembly.GetEntryAssembly().Location); The GetEntryAssembly returns the assembly containing the entry point for the running program. Update: The actual dll you want is loaded from the current directory. But you have to check whether the current directory is different at run time. If it is, you need to open a new Directory. System.IO.Directory.SetCurrentDirectory(Directory.GetCurrentDirectory()); This directory is the directory which contains the dll at run time.
