LAST NIGHT on an airplane with my phone on, I was reading a Star Trek book I'm reading. It's actually the second Spock book I've read. The first is a novelization of an episode in the original series. The character is Spock, but it's just him and McCoy, searching the galaxy for Kirk. I liked that a lot and even though they don't focus on the character Spock, they do have him talking to McCoy in narrative form (not summarizing scenes) that I enjoyed. I read a lot of genres in the short period I usually do before falling asleep on this adventure. I have read War Machine, Assassination Classroom, Solaris Rising, Cinderella Girls - Eureka Seven, Busou Shinki, and Psycho-Pass, to name a few. (Psycho-Pass has been a favorite for a while now and I've read all the volumes.) However, I can honestly say that the Star Trek novel is the first of its kind that I've enjoyed. I've actually had a hard time get a handle on why it was different from any of the other books I've read. I'm not exactly sure when or why it felt different from any of the others, but once I started reading it, it did feel that way. But it wasn't just a novelization. It was a real story. I couldn't put it down. Every single page, every single word, felt like it was important. Every experience felt vital, meaningful, and magnificent.
