Data from self-report interview and examination form the basis for a comprehensive description of factors potentially associated with hospital admission among 361 patients with schizophrenia in a community-based mental health center. Of these patients, 66% were categorized as chronic, 30% as acute, and 4% as transient; 68% were male and 32% were female. Nineteen percent of the sample were receiving treatment in mental hospitals, and 39% were receiving treatment in private practices. The length of time spent in psychotherapy was significantly associated with the number of admissions over the previous year. The presence of psychotic exacerbation was the best predictor of admissions. Earlier this week, my daughter was at the Burger King drive-thru with her infant son. To their surprise, they found an older gentleman who had been waiting to use the drive-thru. When they pulled up, the gentleman flagged them down and said to my daughter: "My granddaughter is five and is really interested in your daughter." Immediately, my daughter started to stutter-stepper trying to explain that she was really no longer interested in any man who would think she would be interested in them. The gentleman smiled and laughed. "We have a 10-year-old who is fascinated with your daughter." "Really?" My daughter said. "She's so young." "Well, yeah, my granddaughter has two daughters who are six and four." My daughter's mouth dropped. "What?" she asked. "I don't have kids." "Ahh," he said. "So you're a 'step-mom'?" My daughter almost burst out laughing. Of course, she was confused. "Uh, no. I mean, they

Lipid peroxides can be formed in biological samples during sample collection and processing. There is a lack of efficient techniques for simultaneously quantifying lipid peroxides and their reduced metabolites in a single plasma or erythrocyte sample. The present paper describes an improved isotope dilution-based derivatization and gas chromatography-mass spectrometry (GC-MS) procedure for the simultaneous determination of two lipid peroxides, 12-(R)-hydroperoxy-tetra-dec-9-enoic acid and 10-oxo-octadecadienoic acid, in human plasma and erythrocytes as well as their corresponding reduced metabolites, 9-hydroxy-octadecadienoic acid and octadeca-10(Z),12(Z)-dienoic acid. The method can accurately and precisely quantify concentrations of both oxidized and reduced lipids in plasma and erythrocytes. The coefficients of variation (CV) of lipid peroxide
