Interferon-beta1a in the Treatment of Multiple Sclerosis. Multiple sclerosis (MS) is an immune-mediated disorder of the central nervous system (CNS) that is frequently associated with a relapsing remitting course. Interferon-beta, which is now approved in 27 countries, is one of the disease modifying agents used to treat MS. Areas covered: Current clinical results suggest interferon-beta-1a as an appropriate initial therapy for patients with relapsing-remitting MS, when there is a substantial risk of future relapses and disability accumulation. This benefit is likely to be independent of previous treatment history with interferon beta-1b. Expert opinion: A larger dataset is needed to accurately confirm the relative benefits and tolerability of interferon-beta-1a compared with other approved MS therapies. However, given its broad approval, potential dose-sparing benefits, safety profile, and known pharmacological modes of action, it will be important to continue the rapid pace of interferon-beta-1a evaluation. transmission has a handshake process for exchanging control information. Since the radio link protocol is for supporting the high data transmission, it is usually designed to satisfy the one-to-one communication between the MS and BS and to minimize the handshaking time for releasing resources. However, in the existing radio link protocol, the control information with a large size is transmitted during the handshake process, and as a result, unnecessary handshaking time is consumed.
