For example, the brain waves or BAERs may provide some indication of the presence of acute damage, such as brain injury, by determining the rate and pattern of recovery of the brain waves following the injury. Alternatively, the brain waves or BAERs may provide some indication of the efficacy of a treatment for a certain condition. BAERs can also be used for monitoring treatment. BAERs are a class of evoked potentials that are generated by electrical stimuli applied to a patient's head. In particular, the system records electroencephalographic (EEG) signals from electrodes placed on the patient's scalp. To record the BAERs, the subject is stimulated with acoustic stimuli, such as clicks, and the EEG signals produced by the brain are recorded. Because the auditory nerve is damaged in patients suffering from traumatic brain injury and disorders, such as craniocerebral injury or tumor, this particular type of afferent information can be used to assist in the diagnosis of damage to the auditory nerve. This afferent information can also be used for therapeutic monitoring and, in particular, the monitoring of the efficacy of treatment for b7e8fd5c8
