Eleven patients with arteriovenous malformations (AVMs) of the elbow were evaluated for treatment with

Teflon endovascular embolization. Ten patients underwent Teflon embolization during a 2.5-year period, whereas the remaining patient was lost to follow-up after 1 year. The patients' ages ranged from 4 to 46 years (mean, 23 years). One to three sessions of Teflon embolization were performed. Teflon particle embolization was effective in all 10 patients: Seven of nine patients had complete obliteration of the AVM after one to two procedures. However, one of seven patients with successful obliteration of the AVM required a second Teflon embolization to complete obliteration. Adverse reactions from embolization were limited to extravasation of Teflon at the time of the first embolization, which did not result in an aneurysm and was successfully treated with aspiration. Patient follow-up averaged 20.6 months (range, 7.5 to 51.2 months). Two patients required additional procedures that were successful. Both of these patients had difficult preoperative evaluation of the AVM. Endovascular embolization with Teflon was effective in obliterating the majority of AVMs of the elbow and eliminated the

In such a case, as long as an attachment occurs at all, it can occur in any orientation.[@b26-ophth-11-1719] The LDB++ device increased the rate of successful attachment of implants. This was likely due to the geometric changes made in the region of the haptic--implants interface. An increase in implant displacement at this region may have made the implant more suitable to be detected and subsequently reoriented, potentially making easier the
