i have a sword, said the woodcutter. and you? cried hatim tai. i have a sword too, but none to match yours. a good axe, a good horse, and a good sword are of more use to me than a bunch of old rusty swords. and i have a little time and money, which is more than you can offer. then the woodcutter, seeing that there was no escape, began to regret his decision and reflected that if he failed he would lose his wife, his children and all he had. however, his wife was a patient, brave, and strong woman and her indomitable spirit made him persevere in the face of his fears. he raised his axe and the woodcutter struck at hatim tai's head, but he missed. hatim tai was ready for him and he easily parried the blow and, with a cry of pain, let the axe fly past his head. he said: god curse your luck, you are still young, he said, and you will live to see me dead. my wife and i, said the woodcutter, are past middle age and i doubt whether we shall see tomorrow's sun. then he began to reflect that he was not so very old and that he might outlive hatim tai. but he did not wish to be the next victim of his axe. he continued to charge hatim tai, who was now determined to take his life. the woodcutter charged, hatim tai parried the blow and ran on and the woodcutter followed him. the woodcutter was now trapped between two dangers. if he failed, he would lose his wife and children and all he had. if he succeeded, he would get his reward but be condemned to an ignominious death. he had little time to reflect, and the axe was already ready for his head. he struck but hatim tai stopped the blow with his sword. he said: if you cut off my head, i will chop off your head; and he brought his axe down.
